Why Startups Struggle with Press Coverage

Stories don't reach the right media

Many press release platforms send your news to the wrong people who are not interested in startups or product launches. As a result, your announcements often go unseen by journalists, blogs, and websites that cover tech, online retail, and innovation. This means your story never reaches the audience that matters most.

Competition is tough

Every day, new startups launch their products and services, making the market crowded. Even if your product is excellent, it can easily get lost among many others without proper media coverage. Strong PR is needed to make your startup stand out and attract attention from potential customers and investors.

Launch momentum is lost

A product launch should create excitement and buzz around your brand, but poor planning or untargeted distribution can waste that opportunity. If your press release doesn't reach the right audience at the right time, your announcement may have little impact. Proper PR ensures your launch gets noticed and remembered.

Traditional PR misses the startup angle

Most PR agencies focus on general industries and do not highlight what makes startups unique. They often send generic messages that fail to show your innovation, value, or growth potential. This makes it harder for your story to stand out and capture the attention of journalists and readers who could support your brand.
